

We were asked to write about our feelings after we came back from Athens last. I didn't know how could I explain all my thoughts and feelings, now I'm in the same situation for the last time and I think it's one of the things that make me feel really bad. There are many things to say about the project but all I can say about their visit to Ankara is that, we were the host country for this time and I hope they felt as much as happy as we had felt when we visited their country... This project has taught me many things like the borders are nothing but tiny details that separate us from each other with fences, walls or lines. Because we don't actually have borders in our heads and hearts. Thanks to this project, helped me to notice many things just like this one and gave me a different perspective. I met many important people and make a few friends who will always make me feel happy with their presences and stay in my life forever. There's an idiom like "All roads lead to Rome." and it means "Everything ends up in the same place and person, that's why all ways eventually lead to the same place and person which or who you knew in the beginning." So I hope we can be together one day in the same place and with the same people where and who we started, and I hope all roads lead to Ankara, Athens or Priedidza next time and we all can meet again.
